English Studies in Latin America: A Journal of Cultural and Literary Criticism

Call for Papers

English Studies in Latin America (ESLA): A Journal of Cultural and Literary Criticism is a double-blind peer reviewed e-journal published by the Department of Literature, at the Faculty of Letters, Pontificia Universidad Católica de Chile.* We review academic articles that consider cultural productions in English (past and present), particularly ones that reflect readings from Latin America about those productions. We welcome the following critical approaches: comparative and intersectional border studies, postcolonial studies, cultural and gender studies, bilingualism and translation studies.

We are currently seeking contributions related to indigenous literatures in English and Spanish. Potential themes include:

- Politics and poetics
- Indigenous identity as motivation to write
- Sovereignty and/or autonomy
- Comparative indigeneities
- Indigenous feminisms
- Struggles over land
- Resistance and indigenous epistemologies

The language of publication is primarily English, but Spanish contributions may be included if they fit within the journal's scope. Critical articles should have approximately 8,000 words. ESLA also accepts poetry, short stories as well as reviews, interviews and essays.

Submissions are accepted throughout the year but the deadline for the upcoming issue is September 1, 2017.

Please email your contribution to esla@uc.cl.

*We are currently taking steps to index the journal, and plan on being indexed in MLA by the beginning of next year.
